leston man, known as "Alabama." His case was deferred.

Dr. McKee is in bad health and hobbled into court leaning on a cane. In a pitiful voice he declared he had never been before a court in his life and asked that mercy be shown him. Denying the charge of selling drugs, he explained that he had lain on a table for a man to "find" the dose upon which the charge of sales was based by the narcotic agents who investigated the matter. Judge McClintic told McKee that he knew that his carelessness in handling drugs had made other addicts at Marlinton, and in view of the state of his health the best thing for him was to send him to Atlanta for treatment.
